

Clint Eastwood

by Thomas Thorhauge
676-018

1

As you get older, you're not afraid of doubt.

Doubt isn't running the show. You take out all the self-agonizing.

2

What can they do to you after you get into your seventies?

3

Even in grammar school they taught you to go with your first impression. It's like multiple-choice questions. If you go back and start dwelling, you'll talk yourself out of it and make the wrong pick.

That's just a theory. I've never seen any studies on it.

But I believe it.

4

My father had a couple of kids at the beginning of the Depression. There was not much employment.

5

Not much welfare. People barely got by. People were tougher then.

6

We live in more of a pussy generation now, where everybody's become used to saying, "Well, how do we handle it psychologically?"

7

In those days, you just punched the bully back and duked it out.

8

Even if the guy was older and could push you around, at least you were respected for fighting back, and you'd be left alone from then on.

9

We've come this far, let's not ruin it by thinking.

21

I don't know if I can tell you exactly when the pussy generation started.

22

Maybe when people started asking about the meaning of life.

Bio: Thomas Thorhauge (1973) has a fetich about charismatic old men's bold attitudes to life – read also 676-009: Jørgen Leth, which a newspaper called "Fresh and congenial, virtuoso drawings."